The Grey Tsunami...Leaving a Mainframe Skills Shortage in its Wake!

LegacyNEXT, Toronto – March 1, 2016

As the “grey tsunami” of baby boomer retirements thunder forward, the mainframe skills shortage creates a new and serious threat to organizations. Who will support critical legacy technology environments? Who will provide code updates; handle hardware service, troubleshooting, and integration with outside systems and applications when key staffs retire taking critical systems knowledge with them? LegacyNEXT’s is pleased to announce its Talent Advisory Services exclusively for mainframe environments.

LegacyNEXT has reimagined talent strategies for enterprise IT organizations facing mainframe skills shortages. We leverage research, analytics and industry insights to help organization brave a demand driven talent market - with powerful insights and practical recommendations.

“We built LegacyNEXT with the goal of helping mainframe organizations overcome their technology skills shortage problem.” said CEO, Susan Dineen. “This is a complex problem with many moving parts – baby boomers are retiring, schools are no longer teaching mainframe skills and graduates are not interested in working mainframe environments. Subsequently, we did a total re-think’ of the skills gap and looked at all the associated issues. I am proud of the fact that we have created a comprehensive program that can fast track our clients to an “in-control’ situation.

Dineen went on to say, “New thinking is required to attract, develop and retain critically needed talent. There is no reason to put the business at risk when strategies and tactics can put you back in control and make you an employer of choice. We are excited to be able to help our clients mitigate the risk associated with the mainframe skills shortage problem.”
